

On the road to a billion transistors per chip, Intel has developed transistors so small that about 200 million of them could fit on the head of each of these pins.